Fueling the Long Run | Proper nutrition will help you perform your best! The Golden Rule for race day is: Nothing new; only tried and true! Your breakfast on race morning should be food you are used to eating before running. Practice this over the next few weeks & experiment well in advance of the race to know what foods work best for you and, more importantly, what doesn't! The right blend of carbohydrates, protein, and a little fat is a good combination. Try eating an energy bar or whole grain toast with peanut butter before your runs. Wash it down with water, sports drink, and possibly a little coffee. For the half-marathon distance, some runners rely only on water and sports drink, while others prefer to use some on-the-run nutrition products such as drinking carb-rich sports drink or consuming gels, chews, or other snack foods. Wash it down with water, NOT sports drink—the combination of sports drink and a gels or chews could be too much sugar in your digestive system at one time and send you running for the porta potty. Once you start taking in nutrition, you should continue taking it about every 45 minutes until you finish the run. *Visit The Sporty Runner for a great selection of chews, gels & more!
